After the Indorsement of Greeley at Baltimore—Then What?

A very good friend, whose good opinion we prize highly, but who, we regret to say, though asked yesterday whether we should do after the Baltimore Convention shall have indorsed the nomination of Greeley; and how we can explain away the force of our present avowal of that "great and good" man and his record.

The first proposition we have responded to is almost every issue of the Ledger since the adjournment of the Cincinnati Convention. We have, day after day, announced that if it turned to the dire extremity of supporting Greeley or Grant, we should take the former—not for any good to be found in him—but upon the idea that no change can make matters worse.

As for modifying or retracting, or explaining away any of the facts which we have from time to time stated concerning him and his record, and the deduction drawn from those facts—we shall simply not pretend to do so. We cannot from our standpoint defend the record of Hiram Greeley, and we shall not undertake the impossible task. If we are forced to support him, it will be in spite of his record, and because nothing better is presented.

If there be no other candidate opposing Grant, then the majority of the Democracy will be closed, so far as participating actively in the campaign is concerned. No Democrat can defend Greeley without utter stultification; and our honest conviction is that there are a million of Democrats in the United States who cannot be brought, in any state of case, to vote for him.

It is because of this that we chose to discuss him and his record candidly before it is too late. We do not think the Democracy ought to touch him, and we prefer to say so in time, and to give the reasons. There is no use of attempting to cover up the past life of Greeley. It cannot be done. His record is too well known by every man in the land.

It is a fact thoroughly understood by the mercantile world, that he is the incarnation of Radicalism—the father, founder, and abettor of all that Radicalism in its most extreme sense; that he originated the "cloud not bigger than a man's hand," and never ceased to "cast" till it spread and settled like a full-blown pall over the whole country—smothering and strangling the liberties of a whole nation; that he was the friend and defender and instigator of old John Brown, and his first act in the bloody drama which has crushed the South and made it a mere straggly, that having egged that people on, and induced them to believe that they would be, and ought to be, permitted to withdraw from the Union, he became the most savage and devilish of all those who clamored for their blood, so soon as his advice was acted upon by them; that he was one of the very few men laying claim to decency, who applauded Butler's hell-inspired order at New Orleans, inciting his soldiery to treat the ladies of that city as "women upon the town plying their vocation"; that after the war was over, and the gallant Southrons—who had made a fight against odds of which history presents no parallel—grounded their arms and lay prostrate and powerless at the feet of Federal power, yielding in good faith all the issues upon which the war was made, he with much magnanimity begging that they be spared the gibbet, and at the same time urged the enactment of Congress, and the execution of the President, of every infamous measure proposed for their oppression and humiliation; sparing their lives that he might still further degrade them; letting them live that he might, little by little, crush out their manhood; that up to this very moment no measure of oppression upon the people at the South has been proposed by Butler, Marton, Sumner, Conkling, Chandler, Pomeroy, or anybody else which has not met his hearty advocacy; that he fell out with Grant, not because of any disagreement on principles or policy, but only because the latter placed the official state of New York in the hands of Conkling; that he has not now, and never had, a sentiment but of hostility to Democrats and the Democratic theory of the Government, and, as largely as he denounces Grant for weakness, vanity and corruption, prefers him to the purest Democrat in the land.

We say all these facts are known, and they render it simply impossible for any Democrat to defend Greeley. Therefore we think his indorsement at Baltimore would be fatal, and we want to prevent it. To this end we propose to raise our voice in warning before it is too late.

Charles Francis Adams is 65 years old, and graduated at Harvard University 1825.
